" defines the right mix of competition and collaboration in a radically changing business environment, with a heavy emphasis on the fields of anthropology, psychology, history, and biology. The goal is to break the cycle of 'winning at all costs' , or of suppressing the individual for the good of the group, while integrating the best of both approaches in an alliance between individuals and organizations. Examples of companies clearly representing these conflicting approaches abound " . Proposes a new management model that combines the best elements of both collaboration and competition. Robbins is a licensed clinical psychologist, and Finley is a business writer whose columns are carried by the Knight Ridder newspaper chain. They document the destructive effects of competition and the often ineffective results of collaboration. Using self assessment , and organizational-assessment tools and examples from the corporate world, the authors show how to combine these two strategies to best advantage. This book is the second imprint in a new series from Business Week magazine, and Robbins and Finley utilize short, article-length chapters that reflect Business Week's journalistic style" . An examination of the influences of competition, collaboration and co-operation on people's behaviour at work. The book shows how to fully exploit a competitive spirit without encouraging obsessive competitive behaviour and how to benefit from this approach.
