Excerpt: . as writer and editor, to Mr. Fisher, an extensive publisher in Liverpool, who was projecting a new Magazine. He says, Now, I most cordially recommend the place, and have no doubt of its being a comfortable maintenance for you, for life: and if you will work, to get things out of hand, (for he is a wonderful man for despatch,) then you will well agree. You may enter on the work any hour you please; the sooner the better. Now, can you come? and will you, first, come and spy out the land? This, I think, would be well. You will find in Liverpool such society as will be pleased with you, and you with them. I need not say, that it will be a pleasure to me to have you near me; and perhaps my direction and advice, in some things which I should know better than you, may be useful. Write immediately. I think you will vastly like the country, the place, and the society. I shall get you the acquaintance of the first literary men in England. Mr. Fisher intends the Magazine to be thoroughly, not profoundly, literary; and thoroughly religious. Every thing of God and godliness to have place in it; and every thing in the compass of knowledge by which the human mind and heart may be improved. He has not even fixed on a name. He wishes also, that, while every thing that is sound in...
