The strong sense and indignant satire of this little poem might yet be turned to account if the parasite could feel shame, or the table-bulfohn be awakened to a sense of honour by the pity, scorn, and insulting applause with which his degrading fooleries are received. To Alphonso Ferrabosco, on his book. This person, descended of Italian parents, was born at Greenwich in Kent: he was much admired, both at home and abroad, for his excellent compositions, and fancies, as they were then called, in music; he was principally employed in setting the songs to music in our poet s masques. Vn.sL. Jonson appears to have had an extraordinary regard and affection for this excellent composer. He delights to mention him upon all occasions; and in the Masque of H3/men, hurried away by his feelings, he interrupts the strain of applause in which he was describing A1phonso s exertions, with a genuine burst of tenderness, Virtuous friend! take well this abrupt testimony: It cannot beiflattery in me, who never did it to great ones; and less than love and truth it is not where it is done out ol knowledge l The learned reader will observe that Jonson had in view Horace s admirable description of the oflice of the ancient Chorus, in the opening of this epigran. And is to a body, often, ill inclined,...
